Bartholomew House appears to have been the book publishing arm of the Macfadden publishing company. The name was derived from the publisher's offices, which were housed in the Bartholomew Building. This company had been used to publish countless pamphlets before and after this period and also issued a line of non-fiction paperbacks called Sport Magazine Library in the late 1950's, see separate index. Bartholomew House last appeared in 1961, after Macfadden acquired Alex Hillman's publishing companies and found itself with an established paperback line, which was quickly renamed Macfadden Books. A dozen or so transitional titles were labeled "Hillman/Macfadden Books" and were published by Bartholomew House.

It is my understanding that Macfadden acted as its own distributor. The numbering of the first two volumes was supplied from ads in later volumes. So far as I know, no volume had multiple printings.

All but one of the books were copyrighted, leaving a perfect record of the publication dates. (The one not registered had only been published in hardcover three months earlier; an additional copyright so soon afterwards would probably have been seen as overkill.) One can clearly see that even though the publishing schedule was somewhat erratic, probably due to wartime paper rationing, from February 1944 through August 1946 Bart House books were issued in pairs. In October 1946 the first movie novelization was issued, bringing that month's total to 3 books. Two more movie novels were issued at quarterly intervals, followed by a final book in November 1947, after a seven-month lapse. All of this suggests that Bart House had ceased to be an active paperback imprint after October 1946, all the subsequent titles being "occasionals." No explanation is known for why numbers 37 and 38 were not used.

From comments in the Catalog of Copyright Entries, it appears that Frederick Orlin Tremaine was editor of the line from start to finish. The first 6 books were all paperback "originals," after which almost all were reprints of hardcovers. The only subsequent originals were the second Lovecraft collection and the three movie novelizations.

Despite the varied selection of titles, over half of the books were mysteries. There were 4 science fiction titles, one of them doubling as a mystery. This was a large amount for such a short run of books, especially in this time period; Tremaine had previously been the editor of a leading SF magazine and clearly retained an interest in the genre. No other genre had enough entries to enumerate, although it may be worth noting that Bart House published no westerns. There were 3 non-fiction books: two true crime anthologies and a memoir. None of the volumes make any statements about the completeness of the texts. Three volumes were compared to other editions without finding any obvious deletions.

There are no cover credits in any of the books seen and, as far as I can tell, none of the covers are signed. Several, including the three movie novelizations, have photographs as cover illustrations. A few other covers may be photos that have been painted over. The movie novels also had photographic endpapers, featuring additional movie stills. Intriguingly, the two mysteries published the same month as the first movie novel also have photographic covers and endpapers, giving the appearance of also being movie tie-in editions. So far as I know there were no contemporary movie adaptations of these books, so the photos were undoubtedly of posed models, a common feature in Macfadden's various true crime and confession magazines. All 40 covers are displayed on the Bookscans website, as well as all five sets of the photographic endpapers.
